THESE are the initial letters to a medical wonder. As human nature is helr to ills of every kind, and as nearly every disease enters and is diffused through the system by the blood, it is evident that if the blood is in an unhealthy condition it imparts to the body its impure state, and disease and death follows. There is a cure for impure blood, and therefore a cure for all diseases arising from it. That cure is Dr. David's 10do-Ferrated Sarsaparilia. closures which had been made possible by such an instrument.
"Don't you think, senator?" he was asked, "that in return for your expenditures a proper compliment would be paid in naming Professor Barnard's moon of Jupiter after you?"
"No; that moon is too far off to be as every day practical as I like to be. I should much prefer to be remembered by my fellow men as one who spent his wealth wisely for the benefit of others, and set an example that other men of means may be example that other men of means may be induced to follow it."

To the support of this university all the Stanford millions will eventually go.

"The demands keep apace with the work," he said, "but I am glad of it. It gives me a chance to carry out those plans with the success of which I desire that my name and life work shall be best known.

"I have been impressed with the fact that of all the young men who come to me with letters of introduction from friends in the east the most helpless class are college young men. They come from those whom I would like to oblige. They are prepossessing in appearance and of good stock.

"But when they seek employment and I ask them what they can do, all they can say is 'anything.' They have no definite, technical knowledge of anything. They

"It is to overcome that condition, to give education which shall not have that result, which I hope will be the aim of this university. Its equipment and faculty I desire shall be second to none in the world. Its capacity to give a practical, not a theoretical education ought to be accordingly foremost.

"The buildings were first erected in the fields, so dormitories were necessary. I did not expect more than 200 or 300 pupils at first, although accommodations were made for twice that number. The first year there were 535 students and now there are 700. These I hope will be fitted for active life.

As public opinion is slow to move it may well be worth while to have the principles of rational, honest politics taught in our schools and colleges to a greater extent than is at present done. We hear much talk in school conventions of "teaching patriotism." But how is it to be taught? The practice of cheering the flag, of learning the biographies of some of our leading statesmen, or of learning to believe, without knowing why, that our country is the strongest and best on earth, will have little effect toward remedying our present political evils. ical evils.

Civil government is something than the written constitution, the names of the officers, the dates of election and other such facts as are taught in our text books on civil government. The civil govern-ment that will help our children to get ideas which later will be of practical use in politics is that which shows the princi-ples of party government, the methods of making nominations of carriers also. ples of party government, the methods of making nominations, of carrying elections, of making appointments to offices, and all the other details of our political life as it in fact is managed, together with the facts of political history and science which show that, however valuable in carrying single elections and advancing local interests, dishonest political scheming may be in the long run the interests of states, as of individuals, are furthered by honest principles; that great public questions are not setthat great public questions are not set-tled till they are settled right, because "the power in men that makes for right-cousness" is, after all, when men's eyes cousness" is, after all, when men's eyes are opened, the dominant one.-Professor Jenks in Century.
